We have been agreeably surprised by the extertainment we have derived from looking over this work. It is a record of the incidents of a quiet country life in a mountainous region of this State, at a distance from the great world. Donestic incidents, the fortones of the family, rural occupations, and intercourse with two or three friends, form the materials of the work, which is thrown into the form of letters. They are written as one would write with as lear of critics before his eyes; always naturally, sometimes with a great deal of sprightliness and graphic power, with an occasional burst of satirawgance, or a feeble passes, which the author did not care to take the trouble of pruning away. A vain of quanthumor often shows itself in the aketches of manners.
